

Innovative

Scheme Aims to Solve Parking Problems

In every town and city there are hundreds of unused parking spaces – including on the driveways of people that are out at work during the day. Now a new online business has come up with a novel solution to the ever-growing problem of city parking by matching people who want to rent out their parking space during office hours with those who are looking for a space.

Parking during the day is becoming more and more difficult in many areas. Over crowdedness in public car parks is greater than ever, and with car numbers escalating, it doesn't look like a problem that will go away. In addition, parking prices are also rising steadily, forcing drivers to look for other options.

Youcanpark.com believes they have found an ideal solution to the problem: by putting commuters in touch with those that have a vacant space available during the day. Every city has its share of unused parking spaces belonging to both residents and businesses. Hitherto these sought-after spots have been going to waste, but not for much longer. After launching in Bath and Bristol, youcanpark.com are now going national.

For a set monthly fee (much lower than local parking rates), customers can solve their parking woes in one go and enjoy a guaranteed safe, secure, off-street parking space.

Meanwhile, residents or businesses that have a space to let can submit their information to the website. Youcanpark charge renters a simple 15% commission for putting them in touch with an interested 'parker'. Depending on the location, monthly rental income can be anything between £40 and £500.

Find out more at www.youcanpark.com.

www.innovationshowcase.co.uk

